What are the different components?

How are they similar?

How are they held together, both formally and conceptually?

How is your understanding of each component shaped by its relationship to the other parts?

Is there an identifiable 'grammar' within the system?

What pattern are visible across the set?

How is it presented, circulated, or accessed?

Dish type, dish name, price

Key ingredient(meat type), flavour, cooking methods

chicken/beef/roast duck/pork/king prawns as key ingredients or curry/chop suey/sweet & sour as flavour

The variation in dishes mainly relies on changing the key ingredient, as the cooking methods are largely the same, making each category feel less distinct.

Meat type + style/vegetable/sauce

A clear pattern of repeating ingredients and cooking methods

Printed leaflet, in list, pick up on site, or possibly delivered with takeaway, digital version available online.

"Any purpose, value, or meaning created within it is provisional; That is limited to a place, time, or circumstance."

Place: Suburban < London < UK < Western world

Time: since 1950s and 1960s.

Circumstance: immigration wave;
most popular of making a living;
adapting to British customs and recognising demand;
prosperous development of Chinese cuisine/takeaway in the UK

Framing

My purpose:

To restore a menu grammar that aligns as closely as possible with Chinese customs.

The relationship between component parts:

Different flavour/ cooking methods/ ingredients

The flavour/cooking methods are important!

Most of the time, the cooking methods for each dish in China cuisine are fixed, with flavours, techniques, and ingredients closely linked. It's not easy to separate them based solely on the type of meat I want to eat today and then choose a cooking method accordingly.

At the same time, regarding the naming of Chinese dishes, it usually consists of the cooking method plus the main ingredient; sometimes, you can't even identify the cooking method and ingredients from the dish name alone.

My purpose:

To show my dissatisfaction with the random combinations of sour-less British Chinese dishes through a motion graphic that resembles a rolling slot machine, after categorising the sauces/cooking methods, main ingredients, and vegetables/sides.

My purpose:

Similar to re-drawing, I want to critique this soulless way of selecting dishes. I want to create an emotionless, standardized takeaway user flow, or a mini-game for ordering traditional British Chinese food, to achieve my purpose. The user flow will mimic the mechanical and impersonal nature of the current takeaway experience, while the mini-game will challenge users to navigate through bland and uninspired menu options.
